Dieter's Nature Notes

Which Squirrel?

American grey squirrels (Sciurus carolinensis).

Many of us will be most familiar in urban parks and gardens (e.g. Yorkshire Museum Gardens) with the grey ones and frequently feed them either deliberately or indirectly via our bird feeders at home. They seem to be at ease in close proximity to humans and are very creative and acrobatic creatures which we often like to watch.

We are less likely to see examples of our native red squirrels whose habitat has been reduced. Also the larger grey squirrels are capable of storing up to four times more fat and are better able to survive winter conditions. Greys produce more young and can live at higher densities. They also carry the squirrelpox virus, to which red squirrels have no immunity.

A question for natural historians is: if we did not have grey squirrels in our urban environments, would we have red ones or would there be none? There were no red squirrels in the farming area of Derbyshire where I lived in living memory, so does the red squirrel require a different environment and habitat? In continental Europe, where there are no grey squirrels it is possible to see red squirrels in urban green spaces and parks. Without the greys would we have the same in the UK?
